

How can I tell if missions is for me?

Everyone has a place in missions. Without strong prayer support, missionary effort is ineffective. Without financial support, missionaries cannot stay on the field. Without church leaders challenging people to consider missions, there is a shortage of cross-cultural workers. So be assured — there is a place for you

But of course some people are called to go, and I believe that's where many people's pathways will lead. A part of finding that out is seeking godly people in your church and asking them for their input. Another part is considering your skills, gifts and abilities and how they might fit.

It's hard to know if you're suited for something you've never tried. I think a big part is giving it a go; the good news is that I've got some ideas for you to consider:

How about making contact with people already reaching across cultures in your own community?

If there is nothing going on, you might be the one to get things started! One of our Glocal workshops might be a first step.

You could spend two weeks to two years on a 'trek' with one of WEC's 101 teams across the world and the people they serve and see how God uses ordinary people in cross-cultural evangelism and church planting.
